Not the Wakeup Call, the Final Call

As Parties took stock of the small progress achieved during the first week at the Conference Centre, residents of Metro Manila were taking stock of lost lives, dwellings and personal belongings that came about due to tropical storm Ondoy. An unprecedented flood, drenching the region with a month's worth of rain in 6 hours, seems clearly linked to climate change. Following the dual plenaries on Friday afternoon, stretching into the evening, ECO

Although flooding swamped through Metro Manila on the eve of the climate change talks, claiming more than 350 lives, it did very little to expedite the sense of urgency of the climate, and business goes on as usual. Photo courtesy of www.honolulu.org

Memo to Australia: Google 'Climate Change'

In the last couple of days the new Australian Government has said it needs more time and information before committing to emissions constraints for 2020. But ECO is not really clear what "new" information they think they need? Seven months ago the now Prime Minister of Australia said: "The IPCC found that the level of greenhouse gases in the atmosphere will be kept between 45-60 parts per million, in order to avoid the most dangerous impacts of climate change."

Global Day of Action

While negotiations for a Bali Mandate continue in Bali, civil society is gathering worldwide to mark the third Global Day of Action against Climate Change. Today, in more than 60 countries, events have been organized to take climate change action into the streets and to the masses - in the form of rallies, fairs, conferences and even cycle rides. All this, to send a strong message - that the time to act on climate change is NOW!

Leading from Below

As we now know, New Zealand's CC Minister has put forward an acceptably weak target (10-20% on 1990 levels, budget with conditions). To add insult to injury, as Ludwig noted yesterday, he has had the gall to challenge Pacific Island countries to show themselves willing to reduce their own emissions - which amount to around 0.60% of the global total. New Zealand's stand at 0.21% (even without allowing for the sheep).

You Can't be Half Pregnant...

Yesterday's target announcement from New Zealand's had one - and only one - positive aspect: It surpassed the extremely low expectations that ECO (and most of the rest of the world) had for it. Now it's just "really really low" instead. And still below the Bali range. Think of it this way: imagine that you have a giant chasm to cross. Call it a "grand climate canyon". If you will. Your entire population lives on one side of the canyon. But scientists warn you that floods, droughts and food shortages will cause unimaginable suffering, unless you can find a way to cross to the other side. Your best scientists, lawyers and engineers conference together, do the measurements, and determine that you need to build a bridge exactly 1000 metres long to enable your fellow citizens to cross safely to the other side.
